Watchmakers and Clockmaker 1660-1837

The watchmakers and, later, the clockmaker were appointed by lord chamberlain's warrant to the gentleman usher, daily waiter. Two watchmakers served under Charles II, one thereafter at £39 16s d4d wages and £39 8s 4d in board wages and £27 17 2d in wages, £30 board wages, respectively. From the reign of William III a single watchmaker received £200 per annum at the treasurer of the Chamber's office. Under George I this was raised to £300, but fell to £150 under his successor.¹ This was partially due to the establishment of a separate clockmaker in 1727. He made £200 per annum by 1782.²

The necessary women were appointed by and under the direct supervision of the lord chamberlain. One necessary woman served at £91 5s until 1695; two until 1702; and three from 1702 to 1727. The first of these made £121 5s; the other two £30-35.¹ In 1705 Anne Hickson was established as necessary woman to the ladies of the bedchamber at £20 per annum.² The establishment of 1727 names six such servants ranging in payment from £121 5s down to £23 per annum. A seventh was added in February 1728, but the number fell to between four and five thereafter.³ Under George III, as head necessary woman, Augusta Brandenburg made £304 6s 4d prior to 1782; this was reduced to £200 per annum in that year.⁴ The necessary woman to the great council chamber made £62; that to the ball room made £62; that to the German chancery £50 (reduced in 1782 to £32); to the king's pages at the Queen's House £50; to the great drawing room £33; to the back stairs £32; to the guard chamber £36 4s; to dust and sweep ashes from Whitehall £40.⁵ In 1825 those to the duke's gallery, backstairs, and German chancery received an additional £30 per annum apiece in compensation for the loss of lodgings consequent upon renovations at St. James's Palace.⁶ By 1836, the necessary woman to the king's private apartments made £45 10s per annum; that to the entrance hall and corridors at St. James's £30; to the guard chamber £32; to the ball room £54 12s; to the Drawing Room £55 plus £30 for lodgings and £20 in lieu of coals.⁷
